

Australian Mammalogy is moving with the times:

As of issue 1, 2020, Australian Mammalogy will move from print to paperless publication, and it will also increase issues from two to three annually.

The Australian Mammal Society and CSIRO publishing would like your assistance to commemorate the occasion by helping us find the top ten Australian Mammalogy articles from the last 37 years. These will be available as a virtual issue free to read for approximately 3 months.

Since its inception in 1972, AM has been an important forum for some of the most pressing issues of our times, such as extinction, climate change, invasive species, and emerging research technologies. We hope you will find time over the break to nominate an article - old or recent - that captures this diversity and relevance.

Nominations close on 20th of January 2020. We will put all nominations to your vote for the final top ten. Just use the link below to nominate up to ten of your favourite articles; you can just paste the reference(s) into the survey monkey text field and we will work out the rest.

If you want to browse AM issues first, you can find all titles (and most PDFS) of Australian Mammalogy from 1972-1999 on the Australian Mammal Society Australian Mammalogy site; for all articles from 2000 onwards, see the CSIRO website (you can access the articles with you membership login).
