

Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa († = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.

	Antechinomys	longicaudatus		(Spencer, 1909)	Large Long-tailed Dunnart	Long-tailed Dunnart, Long-tailed Marsupial Mouse. Indigenous names: Tjarrtjalarranpa (Ngaatjatjarra), Yarnatala (Pintupi), Yarrutju (Ngaanyatjarra)	Taxon name changed from Sminthopsis longicaudata to Antechinomys longicaudatus by precedence - based on new DNA evidence (4 mtDNA and 6 nDNA loci) and existing morphological analyses, which allied S. longicaudata as sister to Antechinomys laniger . This clade was in turn positioned to the exclusion of all other Sminthopsis . The species epithet is adjectival and needed the -us suffix to match the (masculine) gender of genus Antechinomys . REFERENCE: Westerman M et al. 	Sminthopsis	douglasi		Archer, 1979	Julia Creek Dunnart
	Sminthopsis	fuliginosa		(Gould, 1852)	Grey-bellied Dunnart	Sooty Dunnart, Boullanger Island Dunnart (Boullanger Island population of subspecies fuliginosus)	The species epithet is adjectival and needs to match (feminine) gender of genus. Changing to suit convention in this case since only recently recognised as senior synonym to griseoventer
	Sminthopsis	fuliginosa	fuliginosa	(Gould, 1852)	Grey-bellied Dunnart		The subspecies needs to match the gender of the genus. So, there is a change to fuliginosa
	Sminthopsis	fuliginosa	aitkeni	Kitchener, Stoddart & Henry, 1984	Kangaroo Island Dunnart		The subspecies aitkeni is a noun, and not required to match the gender of the genus. So, there is no change

Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa († = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.

Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa († = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.

Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa († = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.

Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa (* = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.

	Canis	familiaris		Linnaeus, 1758	Dingo	Wild Dog, Warrigal	When taken in the context of the entire canid phylogeny, the Dingo is not a divergent monophyletic lineage separate from other canid species (e.g., Zhang et al. 2020). The global canid phylogeny continues to be improved with more comprehensive data (e.g., Bergstrom et al. 2020), supporting the phylogenetic position of the Dingo as part of an Asian lineage of domestic dogs. The IUCN Canid Specialist Group (Alvarez et al. 2019) placed the dingo under the binomial Canis familiaris . The Dingo is as genetically divergent from other domestic dogs as they are to each other, and mtDNA reveals shared haplotypes with domestic dogs and New Guinean singing dogs (e.g., Oskarsson et al. 2012). The evidence does not suggest the Dingo is a unique divergent lineage from the New Guinea singing dog or southeast Asian dogs. The evolutionary history of the Dingo needs to reflect its position in the entire lineage of Asian and Melanesian dogs, including the lineage distribution outside Australia. Species typically need hundreds of thousands to millions of years to diverge. The recent arrival and isolation of the Dingo in Australia (probably within the last 4,000 years) has resulted in some distinct features, likely due to founder effects, selection and genetic drift. Although the Dingo appears to show some functional differences (e.g., Field et al. 2022), and population genetic structure (Cairns et al. 2023), such differences are at a population level and do not translate to reproductive isolation. The Dingo's distinct ecological and behavioural features are not diagnostic of species status. Therefore, the weight of evidence strongly suggests that Dingoes should not be considered as a different species from domestic dogs, and thus, they are placed here under Canis familiaris as a distinct population of wild canid. Future research will of course continue to inform the taxonomic status of dingoes, other dogs and wolves. The Dingo has important cultural, ecological and management value. The taxonomic placement of the Dingo in no way diminishes the importance of conserving them as an ecologically important animal in Australian ecosystems. Gray, 1828)	Dusky Dolphin		Based on a recent revision by Galatius et al. 2025 - Genetic (nDNA and mtDNA), morphological and acoustic evidence was used to demonstrate that Lagenorhynchus cruciger is more closely related to other members of the genus Cephalorhynchus . A new genus, Aethalodelphis , was also proposed to accommodate L. obscurus . Please Note. The AMTC Australian Mammal Species List contains two sheets: a main species/subspecies list, followed by an auxiliary list of unnamed taxa (* = Extinct). The contents of the 'Other Common Names' column were originally sourced from mammal species accounts compiled by experts for the forthcoming publication: Strahan's Mammals of Australia (4th Edition). The AMTC acknowledges that the listed mammal common names are not complete because they will differ depending on the cultural heritage, language and knowledge practices of First Nations Peoples across Australia. The Australian Mammal Species List is updated annually, and we welcome suggested changes and additions, especially from traditional biocultural knowledge custodians, as we aspire to most accurately represent the depth and diversity of traditional knowledge, customs and practices.
